

in a bid to escape, try some side strain with the rod. As it turns, lower the rod down and pull in the opposite direction, this will bring it back out to open water. The fish will try this several times but remember to keep up the tension.

- Make sure you have set the drag on the reel so it does not over-run, otherwise it could end in disaster! Trout reels are not like fixed spool reels, more like a centre pin, but again you have to set the drag accordingly. Trout reels are mainly for storage of your fly line but of course when that trout is running and taking line then turning back you will need to retrieve your line quickly back as mentioned above. Just be careful with all that line around your feet or wind it back on the reel. And don't forget the tension.

- With carp, once they have finished running, the fish will be quite close to you, moving left and right in front of you and staying deep for quite a while before coming to the surface. Once it is on its side bring to the net. But this can be a critical stage. You might think the fish is beaten, but it can suddenly find a burst of energy and pull away. Be ready!

- Trout on the other hand will fight all the way to the net, pulling and jumping to escape the hook, especially when they see the net, so be warned!
